Brazil, eco-bioethics. Taking care of social and environmental problems related to health

Prof. Thomè (Brasil)

Dr Thomè, Head of UNESCO Chair in Bioethics Brazilian Unit, is a psychiatrist in Sao Paulo. Since some years he has been involved himself in eco-bioethics, firmly convinced that medicine or law cannot be apart from the deep influence that environment has on man and society. The application of these principles is realized through a work, together with team collaborators, in training people who hold various institutional roles in order to be a reference point and a concrete psychological support to the survivors of mass disasters. For example, the victims of the flood recently occurred in Santa Catarina, Brazil, have been and still are being supported not only from a psychological side but also from a socio-anthropological one, in order to help them to rebuild their individual and social lives, the consciousness and awareness of their rights as citizens and of their dignity as human beings.
